

2016

Should he stay or should he go?

Television and Online News Coverage of the Labour Party in Crisis

MEDIA REFORM
COALITION

Dr Justin Schlosberg

Media Reform Coalition in association with Birkbeck, University of London

Contents

Executive Summary	p. 2
I. Methodology	p. 6
II. Sources and Issues	p. 8
III. A Tale of Two Reports	p. 12
IV. Spotlight on the BBC	p. 13
V. Conclusion and Recommendations	p. 16

Executive Summary

- 465 online articles and 40 prime time news bulletins assessed
- Twice as much airtime given to critical, rather than supportive voices
- Huge imbalance in favour of issues pushed by Corbyn critics on early evening BBC and ITV bulletins – especially pronounced in headline stories
- Strong tendency within BBC main evening news for reporters to use pejorative language when describing Jeremy Corbyn and his supporters
- Domination of views opposed to the Labour leadership in all but one of the online outlets sampled, and across both left and right-leaning titles
- Online-only news sites relatively balanced in their coverage, as well as the BBC online

Aims and context

The news media have for some time been on the front lines of controversy surrounding Jeremy Corbyn's leadership of the Labour Party. In November 2015, the Media Reform Coalition produced research which showed that newspapers overwhelmingly sought to attack Corbyn's leadership credentials from the moment he was elected.¹ In June 2016, the London School of Economics published research based on a more extensive analysis of newspaper coverage that reached similar conclusions.² Many of the most salient stories and issues observed in those studies reached fever pitch during the political fallout following the EU referendum, and Labour's existential crisis that ensued.

In conjunction with Birkbeck, University of London, we have conducted a real-time analysis of this coverage over a crucial 10-day period following the first wave of shadow cabinet resignations and finishing on the day the Iraq War Inquiry was published. This builds on previous research in two important ways.

First, it provides crucial insights into how the news media responded when the debate about Corbyn's leadership crystallised and when the majority of MPs went on the record in calling for him to resign. The media's role in dissecting and reporting one of the most profoundly destabilising moments in modern British political history warrants urgent scholarly attention.

Second, unlike previous studies, this research focuses on television and online news. It is not surprising that predominantly conservative national newspapers would adopt a negative editorial view of Corbyn and the anti-austerity and anti-war agenda he represents. It is also inevitable that this ideological standpoint will not be contained within the columns and opinion pages but have a defining influence on the press agenda as a whole. Even left-leaning titles have taken an ambiguous and, on balance, critical view of the Labour Party's new direction. But unlike newspapers, television news providers are subject to relatively strict rules on impartiality and balance. From the outset, Jeremy Corbyn's leadership presented a disruptive challenge to routine interpretations of journalistic balance in this sense. In particular, it marked a break from a long-established mainstream political consensus around issues ranging from welfare to war.

¹ See http://www.mediareform.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/2015/11/Corbyns_First_Week-Negative_Agenda_Setting_in_the_Press.pdf

² See <http://www.lse.ac.uk/media@lse/research/pdf/JeremyCorbyn/Corbyn-Report-FINAL.pdf>

Television news also has a uniquely wide reach across the more fragmented and partisan readership of the press. It remains not only by far the most widely consumed news medium but also, importantly, the most trusted.³ Flagship and prime time bulletins by public service broadcasters are especially important in this context, and play an overarching role in reflecting and reinforcing the mainstream news agenda. This in turn may have a potentially powerful influence in shaping the contours of public opinion and debate.

The internet is often said to offer another counterweight to dominant newspaper owners and editors. Previous research suggests that even the online editions of newspapers tend to be more sensitive to a social media-led agenda compared to their print counterparts. Online news is also relatively free of the time and space constraints of traditional platforms, enabling them to cover a much more diverse range of issues and perspectives on any given topic. This provides an important benchmark against which we can examine the particular angles that achieve salience on the television news agenda.

Above all, this research is concerned with the integrity and vitality of the fourth estate. Functioning democracies depend on journalists to scrutinise those in positions of power, and to examine the contesting agendas and narratives that underlie political controversies. This study therefore presents an opportunity to test not only the independent performance of broadcast and online news during an acute political crisis, but also the health and integrity of our media system as a whole.

Mindful of the heightened political tensions and inflamed rhetoric produced by this crisis, we started our research from a much more modest and cautious position. We recognised the right and duty of journalists to report on legitimate concerns raised both within and outside of Westminster about Jeremy Corbyn's leadership, about the future of the Labour Party and, by extension, the future of the British political system. This produced a debate which, in its simplest form, revolved around the question of whether or not Jeremy Corbyn should resign. Each side of this debate was populated by a range of active sources – people seeking to talk to the media and influence the agenda on a daily and even hourly basis – be they MPs, party members or activists, trade unions, etc. Each side also mobilised a range of issues and arguments in support of their cause. Critics of Corbyn, for instance, routinely sought to highlight what they considered to be his leadership failings, his unelectability and detachment from the broad swathe of public opinion. Supporters on the other hand tended to emphasise his grassroots and populist mandate from party members and supporters, the wider popularity of his anti-war and anti-austerity views, and what they considered to be his leadership qualities.

For the purposes of this research, we considered arguments on either side of this debate as equally legitimate and newsworthy. We also adopted an especially cautious approach in coding news texts according to the types of sources and issues covered. We analysed a total of 465 articles and reports drawn from eight online news sites, as well as 40 television news bulletins on BBC One and ITV. Our sample also covered a range of professional news institutions including two public broadcasters; four national newspapers spanning the broadsheet-tabloid and left-right political spectrum; and three online-only news sites (including one former print newspaper). This reflects the full-breadth of what is generally considered ‘mainstream’ news – outlets that provide consistent generalised news coverage that reaches critical mass audiences.

³ See Ofcom's latest research on news consumption in the UK http://stakeholders.ofcom.org.uk/binaries/research/tv-research/news/2015/News_consumption_in_the_UK_2015_report.pdf

Main Findings

What we found overall was a marked and persistent imbalance in favour of sources critical of Jeremy Corbyn, the issues that they sought to highlight, and the arguments they advanced. This was the case across both the online and television sample. Online news stories overall were almost twice as likely to be written by, or focus on sources critical of Corbyn compared to those that were supportive. The BBC evening news bulletins gave nearly twice as much unchallenged airtime to sources critical of Corbyn compared to those that supported him (an imbalance that was not matched by ITV which gave considerably more equal attention to opposing voices).

All four newspapers within the online sample favoured sources opposed to Corbyn’s leadership along with associated issues. This was to be expected given that even the Labour-supporting Guardian and Mirror newspapers had both declared an official editorial position calling for Corbyn to resign. The most balanced outlets overall were those that do not or no longer operate on legacy platforms: the Independent, International Business Times (IB Times) and Huffington Post. Of these, both the Independent and Huffington Post exhibited a slight tendency to favour sources critical of the Labour leadership and the issues they tended to highlight, whilst the IB Times was the only outlet in the sample to give relatively greater prominence to Corbyn’s supporters and associated issues. It was also the smallest outlet in the sample in terms of both audience reach and volume of coverage. These three outlets are further distinguished by their relatively non-partisan editorial stance. Two of them also accounted for over half of all the coverage across the sample focused on Corbyn’s response to the Chicot report.

The more balanced reporting found in these outlets was not matched by the BBC, especially on its main evening TV bulletins. In view of the dominant reach of television news, as well as relatively high levels of audience trust attached to it, this sample was also subjected to a qualitative analysis in order to identify more nuanced themes and patterns in the language and imagery used. What was particularly striking here was the degree to which the Labour leadership and its supporters were persistently talked about in terms that emphasised hostility, intransigence and extreme positions. Given that pro-Corbyn sources were, in most cases, responding to attacks and critiques by members of the Parliamentary Labour Party, this suggested an underlying editorial slant that is out of step with at least the spirit of the Broadcasting Code and the BBC’s own guidelines on news impartiality and balance.

It’s important to acknowledge that, in the case of the BBC, the sample did not reflect the breadth of its news coverage which spans many different programmes on both television and radio, as well as its 24 hour news channel. Indeed, both the Andrew Marr Show and BBC Two’s Newsnight were key vehicles that, at times, leveraged issues and sources favourable to Corbyn across the wider media. But our sample does include two of the BBC’s most watched daily news bulletins that provide a summary of the main news on any given day. Demonstrating impartiality and balance within these programmes, especially amidst such intense political controversy and conflict, would seem to be in keeping with, if not central to, the BBC’s public service mission.

Importantly, the research also shows that bias in the coverage was not inevitable or unavoidable. Whilst the apparent avoidance of the media by the Labour leadership was a prominent theme throughout, this did not prevent journalists from reporting both sides of the debate, as demonstrated by the minority of outlets in the sample that exhibited relative balance. Whilst those close to Corbyn may not have been as active in ‘briefing’ the media proactively as Labour rebels, they provide a constant voice in support of him. Coupled with this, Corbyn himself made almost daily public statements and responses to the crisis throughout the period.

Overall, our findings strongly suggest that in a period of intense conflict and instability within Britain's largest political party, mainstream news gave disproportionate prominence and attention to voices critical of the Labour leadership, and systematically marginalised or maligned opposing views. Whilst this does not appear to have 'harmed' the Labour leadership according to recent polling of its members, it raises serious concerns regarding the diversity of political news coverage to which the majority of citizens are exposed. The BBC is especially important in this context, given that its online news services reach over half the population on a weekly basis, and two thirds rely on its television news programmes.⁴ Amidst the social fracturing and polarisation of democratic life post-Brexit, the need for a more plural and inclusive news media is all the more apparent.

⁴ See <https://reutersinstitute.politics.ox.ac.uk/sites/default/files/Digital-News-Report-2016.pdf>

I. Methodology

This research was based primarily on a quantitative analysis of online and television news texts which were published or aired between 27th June and 6th July 2016 inclusive.

For the online sample, eight news websites were selected as follows:

- BBC.co.uk/news
- DailyMail.co.uk
- HuffingtonPost.co.uk
- IBTimes.co.uk
- Mirror.co.uk
- Independent.co.uk
- TheGuardian.com
- Telegraph.co.uk

These included the four largest UK news sites by audience reach (BBC, Daily Mail, Huffington Post and Guardian)⁵; and all of the four largest newspapers by audience reach across platforms.⁶ It also reflected a mix of newspapers and online-only sites, and spanned the political as well as 'quality' market spectrum.

For the sampling procedure, two different online search facilities were used and cross-referenced (Media Cloud and Google), using 'Corbyn' OR 'Labour' as key terms within the title. Although no sampling source is fool proof when it comes to online news, this cross-referencing combined with the relatively large volume of coverage was considered sufficient to iron out any anomalies caused by gaps in the sample.

The results were then manually filtered to include only articles that were text-based (more than 200 words) and focused on either a) the Labour Leadership crisis, b) the publication of Shami Chakrabarti's report on anti-semitism within Labour, and c) Jeremy Corbyn's response to the publication of the Iraq War Inquiry's report. Though ostensibly addressing separate topics, all three of these stories were intimately related to the debate over Corbyn's leadership.

This yielded a sample for analysis of 465 articles that were then carefully coded for primary format (comment/opinion or news item), primary issue and primary source. For the primary format category, 'news item' was taken to denote all text-based articles that were not clearly identifiable as comment or opinion. This included analysis, features and sketch articles that are not typically associated with day-to-day reporting but nevertheless are, on the surface at least, devoid of a subjective viewpoint.

For the issue and source categories, a 'grounded theory' approach was followed where the categories were continually revised and expanded over the course of the analysis. This produced a relatively exhaustive list of 15 codes for the issue category and eight for the source category, reflecting the full breadth of coverage angles, frames and voices. Examples of issue code headings included 'Calls for Corbyn to go' and 'Critique of Labour coup', whilst examples of primary source code headings included 'PLP/leading party figures (critics)' and 'Corbyn/aides/PLP (supporters)'. Reliability of the coding was then tested by giving a trained second coder a 20 percent sub-sample to analyse. This yielded a strong agreement rate of 94 percent.

Whilst sources were relatively easy to categorise as supportive or critical of the Labour leadership (or neither), categorising issues in this way was more difficult. Some of the issues were clearly aligned with one side or the other (such as critique of or praise for Corbyn's leadership record or qualities). For others, determination was based on the degree to which the issues were routinely highlighted by critical or supportive sources. So, for instance, whilst allegations of anti-semitism within the Labour party are not explicitly or necessarily a critique of the Labour leadership, they tended to be advanced by those who were otherwise critical, and often linked the allegations to an assumed failure of leadership, or a critique of its supporters.

⁵ Ibid.

⁶ See <http://www.nrs.co.uk/latest-results/titles-at-a-glance/quick-view/>

The researchers took particular care to avoid making judgements about a primary issue or source focus in online news items unless it was explicitly apparent (38 percent of articles were recorded as 'other or unclear' for the issue category and 29 percent for the source category). This approach was also followed when determining whether particular issues favoured opposing perspectives on the leadership debate. So, for instance, articles that were coded as reporting the 'facts' of shadow cabinet resignations or the vote of no confidence in Jeremy Corbyn by Labour MPs were considered neutral in this respect, whilst those focused on arguments or statements (such as calls for Corbyn to resign or pleas for party unity behind the elected leader) were coded as critical or supportive of the leadership.

Not surprisingly, there was general congruence between the two categories, i.e. most articles that were considered to focus on an issue favourable to Corbyn also tended to focus on a source or group of sources that supported him, and vice versa. But there were a significant number of exceptions to this which underlined the need for both coding categories. For instance, articles on Corbyn's appearance before a Parliamentary Select Committee hearing on anti-Semitism tended to focus on Corbyn himself as the primary source, but on an issue that was generally advanced by his critics (the problem of anti-semitism within the Labour Party).

For the television sample, the broadcast news archives at the British Library were used to access the early and late evening news bulletins on BBC One and ITV throughout the 10-day period. The sample was then compiled using the same criteria as the online sample, i.e. stories that focused on any of the Labour leadership crisis, anti-semitism report or Corbyn's response to the Chilcot report. These stories or story 'packages' were then coded first for prominence (lead headline, other headline or other news). But when it came to issues and sources, a different analytical framework was adopted in order to account for the nuances of the medium and sample. Given that an individual news report on the main evening bulletins tends to provide a summary of the day's events and news related to a given topic or story, making judgements about 'primary' issue or source is inherently more difficult compared to print and online articles. Instead, and in an effort to minimise subjective interpretation on the part of researchers, the full range of issues was identified within each report, along with the total airtime and number of unchallenged critical and supportive voices that were featured.

This quantitative analysis was restricted to scripted news reports as these present a relatively defined unit of analysis. It was also restricted to the early evening bulletins on both channels to avoid double counting material that was repeated on the later editions. However, a further qualitative analysis included reports on both early and late editions as well as headline sequences, anchor introductions and live 'two-ways' between anchors and correspondents. This produced a considerably richer and fuller picture of the coverage and also served to substantiate findings from the quantitative analysis.

II. Sources and Issues

An inequality of voice

Supportive sources predominantly consisted of Jeremy Corbyn himself, the Labour MPs that remained loyal to his leadership, spokespeople from Momentum (the grassroots activist group campaigning on his behalf), and Trade Unions. Critical sources were largely made up of rebel MPs, as well as former party leaders and Prime Ministers. Labour councillors, constituency officials and individual party members spoke both for and against the leadership. When analysing online articles, a judgement was made as to whether or not the story was framed exclusively or predominantly around a particular type of source, or group of sources, either named or un-named. The headline was used as an indicator but not exclusive determinant of this. So, for instance, a story that was headlined Angela Eagle vows to challenge Jeremy Corbyn if he fails to step down indicated the potential for a primary source (Angela Eagle). In most cases, the article attached to such a headline was predominantly framed around Angela Eagle's pronouncements, or un-named sources close to her. But in some cases, the article would give equal attention to responses from Jeremy Corbyn, his aides or other MPs critical of Eagle. Where there was comparable attention given to contesting sources within a given article, no primary source was recorded, even if the story was triggered or cued by a particular figure or group.

For comment and opinion pieces, identifying 'voice' was more straightforward since the majority tended to be either explicitly critical or supportive of the leadership. Figure 1 shows the proportions across the sample. This provides the clearest illustration of the relative distribution of 'voice' in the coverage and reveals the dominance of those critical of Corbyn in all but one outlet (the BBC is excluded here as it does not produce explicit opinion or comment articles).

Figure 1. Distribution of 'voice' in comment and opinion pieces

When it came to news reports, a much less pronounced imbalance was found with five out of eight outlets exhibiting greater preference for primary sources critical of the leadership (with a more than 10 percent difference).

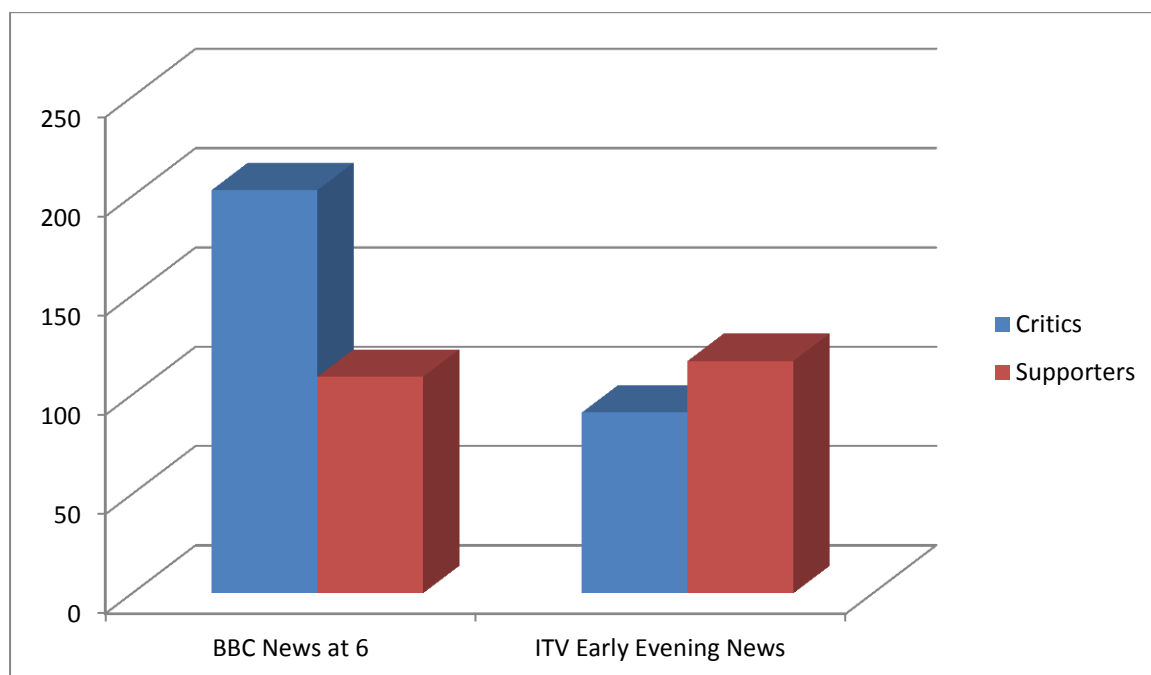

Figure 2 Primary sources in news items

Whilst the BBC was more balanced in this measure compared to the Telegraph, Daily Mail and Mirror newspapers, it was notably less balanced compared to the Independent and IB Times.

But the BBC's source treatment was particularly problematic in the main evening TV bulletins. Although the number of sources expressing views on each side of the debate was only moderately weighted in favour of Corbyn critics (13 versus 9), there was considerable discrepancy in the proportion of airtime offered to each side, as shown in figure 3.

Figure 3 Critical versus supportive sources on the BBC and ITV (unchallenged airtime in seconds)

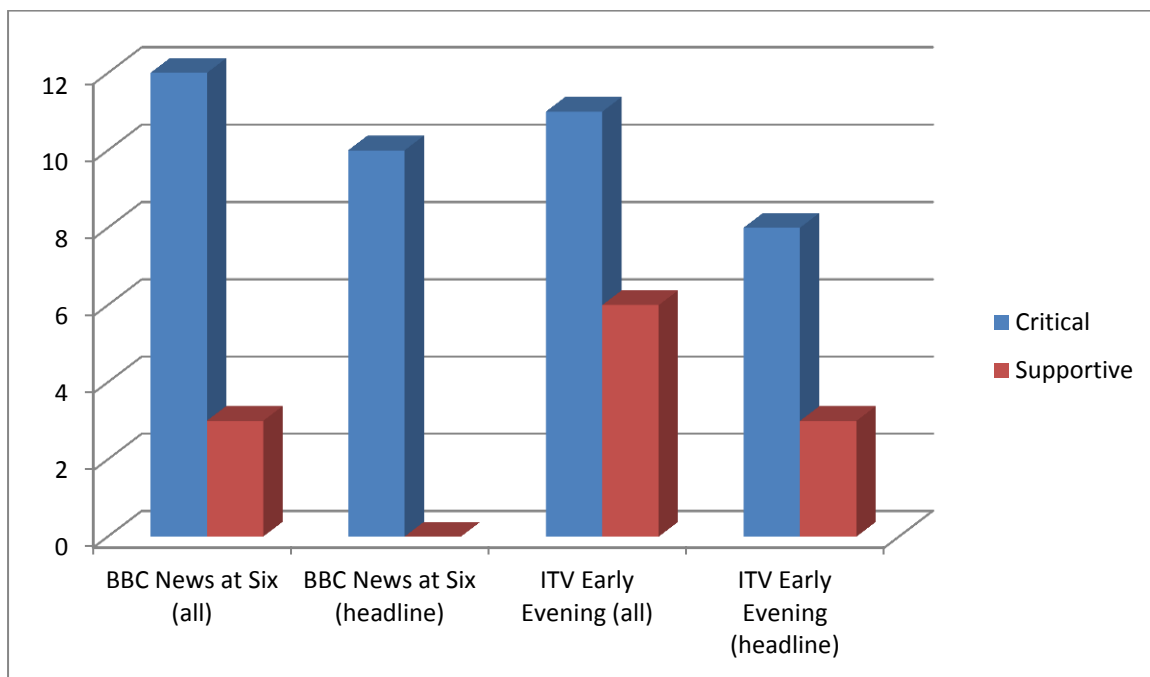

Issues that matter

When it came to the primary issue focus of online articles, there was a significant discrepancy between the performance of newspapers on the one hand, and the BBC and online-only outlets on the other. The former exhibited a clear bias in favour of issues that tended to be pushed by critics of Corbyn whilst the latter were relatively balanced in their coverage on this measure. Figure 4 shows the proportion of primary issue articles that favoured critics and supporters of the leadership across the sample.

Figure 4 Proportion of primary issue articles online (comment and news items combined)

Unfortunately, the relatively inclusive approach adopted by BBC Online in this context did not transcend to the TV bulletins. Here both the BBC and ITV gave considerably more attention to issues favourable to critics but once again, the imbalance was notably more pronounced on the BBC. Figure 5 shows the total number of issue-frames present in news reports that favoured critical versus supportive views of the party leadership. It also shows that the imbalance in favour of critical perspectives was much greater on both channels when we consider only headline stories.

Figure 5 Issue-frames favouring critical or supportive views in TV news

III. A Tale of Two Reports

As expected, the bulk of articles and reports in both online and television samples were focused directly on the Labour leadership crisis. But a significant minority also included reporting on the unveiling of two much anticipated and controversial inquiry reports. The first marked the culmination of Labour's inquiry into allegations of anti-semitism within the party, which was conducted by respected human rights lawyer and civil rights campaigner Shami Chakrabarti. The second was the long-awaited Chilcot Inquiry into the Iraq War.

The latter was clearly a major news topic in its own right and we did not expect Jeremy Corbyn's response to the Chilcot report to be an especially prevalent theme within the wider coverage. But it was one which intersected with the on-going leadership crisis and we did consider it newsworthy to the extent that Corbyn had been a longstanding voice of the anti-war movement and an outspoken critic of Tony Blair. Indeed, his opposition to the Iraq War is often cited as a key platform on which he was elected leader of the party. The publication of the Chilcot Report also uniquely aligned Corbyn's views with the general swathe of newspaper opinion within the sample.

But whilst there were 18 articles within the online sample that were focused on Corbyn's response to Chilcot's report (either prospectively or retrospectively), more than half of these were carried by just two titles: the Independent and IB Times. Indeed, the proportion of these articles within the IB Times sample was more than five times that of the Guardian and Daily Mail and more than ten times that of the Mirror, all of which harboured a longstanding opposition to the war in line with Corbyn's views. The BBC website carried one article focused on Corbyn's response but, strikingly, made no mention of it in either of its main evening bulletins on the day the report was published.

A much greater spotlight was cast over Corbyn's response to the anti-semitism report. But this was predominantly framed in negative terms as a result of fresh allegations of anti-semitism raised in respect of Corbyn's statement that "our Jewish friends are no more responsible for the actions of Israel than our Muslim friends are for the various self-styled Islamic states or organizations" which was purported to draw a parallel between the Israeli State and terrorist organisations (a charge which he strenuously denied). In addition, Labour MP Ruth Smeeth accused Corbyn of a failure of leadership in not reprimanding an activist who alleged she was working in partnership with the Telegraph.

But there was another story which, to its credit, was given equal coverage in the BBC online sample. This highlighted the main finding of Chakrabarti's report that "Labour is not overrun with anti-semitism" and its decision not to recommend a permanent ban of any suspended MPs. Apart from the BBC, there were just two other articles within the entire sample that adopted this as a primary issue focus: one carried by the Mirror and the other by the Independent. Whilst BBC television reports made frequent reference to the fresh allegations of anti-semitism that surfaced during and after the report's launch, no mention was made of the report's actual content.

IV. Spotlight on the BBC

The BBC often responds legitimately to accusations of television bias with reference to the diversity of its news output across channels. This is legitimate because it is consistent with both its own guidelines and Ofcom's Broadcasting Code, which applies to all UK broadcasters, and allows for impartiality to be achieved across a series of editorially-linked programmes rather than within a single bulletin.⁷ But the guidance in both cases is nevertheless vague on this point, and the BBC Trust has in the past emphasised the need for 'mainstream' news programmes to demonstrate impartiality within, as well as across, its output.⁸ In its comprehensive review of the breadth of opinion in BBC output carried out in 2013, the Trust also made clear that whilst it is fitting for wider programming to explore the 'wagon wheel' of diverse views on any given topic, news programmes are rightly inclined to focus on the most prominent binary or opposing views.⁹

In-depth and analysis news programmes such as BBC 2's Newsnight and the Andrew Marr Show have a reputation for playing an agenda-leading role and this was evident to some extent in our sample. For instance, Len McCluskey (general secretary of the Unite union) appeared on the Andrew Marr show mid-way through our sample period and his outspoken support for Corbyn and critique of rebel MPs on that day triggered much of the relatively pro-Corbyn coverage within the sample.

But whilst such programmes may be relatively influential on the wider news agenda, the main evening bulletins on BBC One reach a considerably larger audience, most of whom cannot reasonably be expected to watch its more in-depth news output on other channels and at other times. As such, we might expect impartiality rules to dictate a particular sensitivity towards fairly reflecting opposing views within mainstream bulletins. But that does not appear to have been the case here.

More problematic was the way in which BBC reporters used particular language and imagery when discussing the crisis that systematically undermined the legitimacy of arguments in support of the Labour leadership. This was evident in a qualitative analysis that looked at both the early and late evening bulletins, as well as 'in studio' elements including anchor introductions, headline sequences and live 'two-ways' between anchors and correspondents.

One of the most striking patterns that emerged was the repeated use of language that invoked militarism and violence. This is not surprising given that the prospect of Labour facing a 'civil war' was inherently newsworthy. But BBC correspondents tended to ascribe militancy and aggression exclusively to Jeremy Corbyn and his supporters rather than Labour rebels, in spite of the fact that the leadership was, throughout this period, largely on the defensive in responding to attacks and accusations by rebel MPs. The picture conveyed was one of Corbyn and his supporters adopting hard line stance in 'refusing to back down' and risking the future of the Labour Party in doing so. The following extracts were typical of the language used in and around reports in this context, especially during the first four days of the sample period when the attempted 'coup' was in full force and occupied headline status:

⁷ See <http://stakeholders.ofcom.org.uk/broadcasting/broadcast-codes/broadcast-code/impartiality/>

⁸ See http://downloads.bbc.co.uk/bbctrust/assets/files/pdf/review_report_research/impartiality_business/business_impartiality_report.pdf

⁹ See http://downloads.bbc.co.uk/bbctrust/assets/files/pdf/our_work/breadth_opinion/breadth_opinion.pdf

“[Jeremy Corbyn] is at war with his own MPs and it’s a war he means to win”

“His army of followers as hostile to most Labour MPs as he is, spear carriers in a civil war he’s now determined to fight and win at all costs”

“making the rebels’ worst nightmare come true”

Related to this was an explicit emphasis on the apparent unreasonableness and stubbornness of Jeremy Corbyn, described in one report on both the early and late evening edition as “anti-capitalist and no compromise”. But this was in conflict with several aspects of Corbyn’s leadership record such as his appointment of a relatively inclusive shadow cabinet prior to the resignations, and his decision in November 2015 to allow MPs a free vote on whether or not to go to war in Syria.

Nevertheless, Corbyn’s position in the Labour leadership crisis was repeatedly described in terms that invoked bewilderment over his defiance. The BBC’s chief political editor Laura Kuenssberg remarked in a live two-way on BBC News at Six:

Now the danger of course in all of this is while they're engaged, locked in this complete battle with him refusing to back down that so much damage is done to the Labour party that it could take them years to recover from this if they actually recover from this at all. But Mr Corbyn's team is still sure they have the overwhelming support of Labour party members across the country who backed him so enthusiastically in the heady days of last summer. But as this slow moving car crash continues I have to say relying on the Labour party members support for good is a hell of a gamble for Mr Corbyn's team to take.¹⁰

What is particularly noteworthy about this extract is that it appears, on the surface, to exhibit balance by referring more or less equally to the two main ‘issues’ advanced by each side of the debate. The rebels – whose subsequent campaign was named ‘Saving Labour’ – have persistently sought to emphasise what they see as the disastrous consequences for the party that would result from the Labour leader remaining in post. In contrast, Corbyn’s supporters have generally contested these claims arguing that, far from being a destructive force, Corbyn’s grassroots support could and should serve to unite and reinvigorate the party. But in the statement above, which was typical of the language used across the BBC television sample, the perspective of rebel MPs was unattributed and reported as ‘fact’, whilst the view of “Mr Corbyn’s team” is both attributed and questioned at the end of the statement.

On more than one occasion, reporters made reference to un-named sources within the rebel camp specifically in regard to supposed ‘evidence’ of Corbyn losing support among either Trade Unions or party members. In a weekend edition, reporter Chris Mason declared that “I’ve been sent this dossier by a recently resigned shadow cabinet minister attempting to highlight how support for their leader is beginning to slip away amongst Labour’s grassroots.”¹¹ But there was no mention of any evidence underpinning this dossier, nor any attempt to alert viewers of its possible or likely one-sided perspective. Given that the use of single un-named sources in high profile political controversies has been the subject of a number of editorial crises within the BBC over recent years, we might have expected reporters to be more cautious in reporting on such claims.¹²

¹⁰ BBC News at Six, 29th June

¹¹ BBC National News, 3rd July

¹² In the aftermath of the Hutton Inquiry in 2003, the BBC revised its editorial guidelines to emphasise the need for extra caution when dealing with single un-named sources, especially in high profile political controversies. See

http://downloads.bbc.co.uk/aboutthebbc/insidethebbc/howwework/reports/pdf/neil_report.html

As well as attributing hostility and intransigence to Jeremy Corbyn and his team, journalists also tended to describe Corbyn's grassroots supporters in this way, often using pejorative terms such as "far left backing" and "hard core support". At other points, this kind of language was used in a questioning rather than assertive way, such as when reporter John Pienaar introduced a party activist speaking at the launch of Labour's anti-semitism report with the leading question "was this far left prejudice?"¹³

Of course, in doing so the reporter was not explicitly endorsing the accusations of anti-Semitism levelled at the activist, who suggested that a Labour MP was working "hand in hand" with the Telegraph newspaper. But the juxtaposition of the words 'prejudice' with the phrase 'far left' reinforced the notion that anti-semitism was somehow associated with Labour's shift to the left under Jeremy Corbyn, a point that critics of the Labour leadership have been pushing since he was elected. What's more, although this question clearly conveyed the views of those who accused the activist of being anti-semitic, it was not followed by any reference to contesting views, including the activist's own response to the accusations.

In contrast to the notions of hostility and intransigence, there was also repeated use of language and imagery that associated Corbyn with weakness and failure. Descriptive words and phrases such as "awkward", "laughing stock" and "no authority" were used repeatedly without qualification. Particularly noteworthy in this respect was the closing statement of a report on the BBC News at Six which concluded that "This is a fight only one side can win. The others being carted off to irrelevance. The place for political losers". This was set against a shot of a moving garbage truck emblazoned with the word 'CORBYN'.¹⁴

¹³ BBC News at Ten, 30 June

¹⁴ BBC News at Six, 27 June

IV. Conclusion

This research has uncovered systematic failings in the way that mainstream news organisations covered the emergent Labour leadership crisis. We fully recognise the pressures that journalists are under in a real-time news cycle; in most cases facing continual resource cuts; as well as the particular professional challenges that come with covering such an unprecedented and rapidly unfolding political crisis. It is not our intention to ascribe 'blame' for these failings either to journalists or news organisations.

Nor do we claim that our sample was representative of the entirety of mainstream news coverage in relation to this issue over time or across all outlets. But the sample we analysed did contain a breadth of different types of news organisations, platforms and, above all, the most widely consumed and trusted news sources. It also focused on a period of intense journalistic scrutiny and a critical moment in which the dominant narratives around the future of the Labour Party were being shaped.

The research offers further evidence that the internet offers no boon or automatic solution to problems associated with concentrated media power. Though newspapers are under increasing commercial pressure, their audience reach across platforms is, in most cases, larger than was ever achieved in the pre-digital era. It is highly plausible that their relatively pronounced editorial positions against the Labour leadership had a seeping influence over the wider news agenda, including the BBC. This is a situation that academics have analysed previously, for example in relation to broadcast coverage of the 2015 general election.

We have focused our scrutiny and concern on the BBC's coverage (and especially its main evening TV bulletins) in view of the cross-over audiences it attracts, the high levels of trust attached to its reporting, and the centrality of news impartiality and balance to its public service mission. But its coverage on the whole did not live up to, in our view, either its reputation for balance or the spirit of its editorial guidelines.

What was perhaps of most concern in this respect was the repeated way in which supporters of the Labour leadership were labelled with pejorative terms that suggested extreme positions, with the implication that Labour rebel MPs were, by contrast, moderate in both their political views and actions. Jeremy Corbyn was elected leader of the party less than 10 months ago with an overwhelming and unprecedented mandate from hundreds of thousands of members and supporters. He was elected on a platform of principled opposition to austerity, privatisation and the Iraq War, policies which polling suggests attract significant support among the British public as a whole. By any measure, they should not be considered or implied by journalists as being on the extremities of the political spectrum.

In view of this, we recommend that the BBC revise its editorial guidelines for covering political controversies on news programmes. In particular, guidelines should take account of the need for extra care in assigning descriptive labels to a particular set of political views such as 'moderate' or 'hard'; offering due qualifications and caveats when reporting on single un-named sources; and demonstrating balance and impartiality within the main news bulletins on BBC One and within individual reports on these programmes

We hope that this research will provide an opportunity for constructive engagement with the BBC and other mainstream providers that strive to achieve fairness and balance in their political news coverage. We also hope that it will galvanise policymakers to address the real and present threats to news plurality in the UK. The need for reforms that support diverse, independent, and accountable media at a time of intense political upheaval and uncertainty has never been more urgent.